• Allows you to change the Windows Explorer background • Available for Windows 98 and XP • Portable version • Adds a folder selector to set the image file as background for that folder • Standard Windows Explorer with the option to select a folder to modify • Does not modify the Windows registry or the Explorer.exe file • Free should be perfect So, if your control is limited by them, you shouldn't be put in that position in the first place. When we set up a new control on any given page, we assign some kind of identifier for this control, and then wrap it in a close tag. Then, we assign some kind of CSS style for this control. You're saying we should be able to use something like the Closure Stylesheet to apply some of these styles to the page. What is the benefit of doing this, rather than just creating the stylesheets ourselves on the fly? Well, one benefit would be to not have to worry about the amount of CSS being generated by the script. I can apply as much or as little CSS to the page as I want, as long as it will fit within whatever size limit you'd specified. The loading of the Closure Stylesheet page will only be triggered when the page is first loaded. The CSS wouldn't be loaded until the first time the page is modified. (Same thing with the rest of the script and the script itself). Second, I'd like to automatically pull out a basic stylesheet if I don't have one yet, or if the control is specified as a blank control. Second, I'd like to automatically pull out a basic stylesheet if I don't have one yet, or if the control is specified as a blank control. Can you be more specific about the 'blank control'? A common reason you might be setting a control as 'blank' is because you'd like to specify a default value if the control is left empty. Another common reason to set a control to 'blank' would be to allow for AJAX loaded controls, in which case you could specify your own AJAX script that generates an onchange event handler. Typically, there's a nice header tag that we have to have, and the header tag is always blank. My experience with the html.js library (which is pretty much what we're talking about here) is that I have to set the CSS for a control. I think this might be my

In this tutorial, we will show you how to remove the eye icon from the Windows 8 Start menu, and replace the transparent background with a static and plain black background, without any text. It's time to give your Start menu a much needed redesign. You may already know that Windows 8 has started using a swanky new Start menu. This thing is called the "Start screen" as some call it. Basically, it is a face-lift for the Windows 8 start menu. You can enable it from the built-in control panel if you want to, or simply enjoy the open source alternatives. How to remove the eye icon from the Windows 8 start menu As we have seen before, there is an eye icon in the Windows 8 Start menu. It doesn't have any particular significance as far as I am concerned, however. There's a fix for this, and it's one that we'll show you in this tutorial. To make things even easier, we'll be updating the Start menu for Windows 8 without actually altering the original files. Remove the eye icon from the Windows 8 Start menu using registry editing There are two ways to remove this eye icon from the Windows 8 Start menu. We'll show you how to use both methods. Method 1 - using registry editing You can easily remove the eye icon from the Windows 8 Start menu by removing the following registry key. HKEY_CURRENT_USER\Software\Microsoft\Windows\Current 09e8f5149f
