Understanding the molecular basis of colorectal cancer (CRC) represents a considerable challenge, as

CRC development and progression are a result of a complex network of signal transduction pathways. The identification of new genes and pathways involved in the CRC development could suggest new diagnostic tools, therapeutic targets, and personalized approaches. Current CRC genomic tests are based on single-gene testing and fail to provide a complete picture of CRC, since their sensitivity is limited and they cannot be used for early detection. To fill this gap, we have developed a new workflow for the identification of gene regulation patterns from a commercially available microarray (Human WG-6 v2.0). The results of the workflow indicate that its ability to detect different patterns correlates well with published microarray datasets, and that combined analysis improves the detection of known or hidden gene regulation patterns in CRC. In conclusion, the sensor array-based workflow provides a promising framework for future research into gene regulation in CRC.Sandy Hook Victims Had No Time to React Psychologist Michael Baden says that the mentally ill isn't always capable of a thought process that would help them escape an impending death. NEWTOWN, Conn. (CBS) — In 2012, 17 schoolchildren and staff members were killed at Sandy Hook Elementary School. In a report published Thursday, a psychologist concluded that three of the 20 people at the school at the time “were incapable of feeling fear in any way, let alone with such intensity to prevent their escape.” Psychologist Michael Baden told CBS News a half-dozen children in that auditorium were likely standing within 5 feet of a gunman, and the rest of the victims in that classrooms would have been less than two feet away 595f342e71
