Images 1 to 15 of 15A Bayesian analysis of productivity gains from scaled adoption of agricultural research in developing countries: Revisiting a simple method. Does scaling-up agricultural research have an impact on agricultural productivity (ATP) gains in developing countries? In earlier work, this question was answered by a simple method that we developed, which compared the average ATP gains for a group of countries with those of one country as a scenario base (West). To assess the robustness of our method to alternative scenarios, we reanalysed our original data set with a more elaborate and more realistic method. This alternative method allowed us to elaborate on our original results by comparing the average impact of the scale-up of agricultural research and extension services on ATP gains in developed and developing countries. The reanalysed data set included 11 developing and 13 developed countries. The ATP gains derived by the more elaborate method were in line with those derived by the simple method: the growth rates estimated from the more elaborate method were approximately 1% less than the growth rates estimated by the simple method. Hence, the simple method should be sufficient to analyse the impact of the scale-up of agricultural research and extension on ATP gains. Scaling-up agricultural research and extension is expected to increase ATP gains in developing countries. In a recent paper, we outlined a simple method to analyse the

How To Remove Don't Starve Together v255151 License Key From System Free){ref-type="table"} show that a greater number of pathogens were responsible for blood stream infections compared to our previous study that was conducted for 5 years from 2005--2009. This may be due to the fact that a greater number of patients with severe underlying disease were admitted to the hospital during 2009--2011. Similarly, at least 1.4% (50/3468) of septicemia cases were not diagnosed by using the electronic laboratory record system. We previously reported that the number of patients diagnosed by using the electronic laboratory record system was 84.7% (5286/6173) in our previous study for 2005--2009 \[@B9\]. This suggests that appropriate electronic laboratory record systems provide a more reliable method for the detection of sepsis. It is widely accepted that susceptibility testing of bacteria is useful for selecting an appropriate antibiotic and for preventing the development of bacterial resistance \[@B19\]. Conventional methods have several limitations, especially when rapid identification of an infecting bacterium is necessary or when the isolate is of a rare species \[@B19\]. In addition, identification of bacteria can be difficult for some bacteria, such as Acinetobacter spp. or C. perfringens. The VITEK 2 system provides rapid identification of microorganisms, including anaerobes, and MIC determination to guide an appropriate antibiotic therapy \[@B20\]. Our study showed that the VITEK 2 system accurately identified the bacteria responsible for bacteremia, and its performance was excellent in more than 96% of cases. The correct identification rate for Gram-positive bacteria was only 72.5% and for Gram-negative bacteria it was 95.6%. This result was similar to that of a previous study \[@B19\]. However, we found that the VITEK 2 system identified MDR bacteria correctly in 67.3% of the cases that did not exhibit resistance to most antibiotics, suggesting that the VITEK 2 system may be useful for the rapid identification of non-MDR bacteria. Our findings showed that the mortality rate was 14.7% and, interestingly, we could not identify any determinants of poor prognosis. These findings
