Operational upgrades have begun at a key railroad that could affect connectivity for crude shipments from Cushing, Okla., to the Gulf Coast. Implemented beginning July 1, the interoperability upgrades at CSX's Gulf Coast line should help expand carrier access to the Midwest Gulf Coast corridor. The process, however, has inconvenienced local shippers and some of them have filed a lawsuit against the U.S.

Department of Transportation in West Texas. "We are delighted that we have reached this point," Robert Wake, the new president of the rail line's parent company Georgia-Pacific, told affected shippers in a June 2 newsletter. "They say they were in a holding pattern as the federal government implemented the requirements. They had a deadline to get out the door with new equipment and the deadlines were getting missed." CSX implemented the upgrades as the U.S. demanded carriers work to achieve interoperability standards, which entails ensuring that hauliers can access and use rail services through CSX regardless of what railroad each carrier operates. Implemented by the U.S. Coast Guard as part of the safety enhancement program, the rule says that CSX must increase its capacity and rail service to help shippers better move crude oil through the CSX Gulf Coast line.

"The new equipment and trailers in the past were not interoperable," CSX spokesman Ed Colley told DTN in June. "You could bring it on to my line, but it didn't come off any other railroad. It was worthless to us. We were losing business to those who could use the interchange” with other railroads
