Around this time he received a letter from a man in New York who claimed to be the director of the Pentagon's 25th Reconnaissance Squadron, explaining that he had recruited Martin into the Air Force in the summer of 1943. The director asked Martin to keep the information secret, but to "gather whatever information I can on the personnel of the 1st Air Commando, your school, your instructors, and of course the outfit," since he had not been told about it. Martin believed the blast's effects on him were the reason he was recruited into the Air Force. He described how at the time, Roosevelt was in Warm Springs, Georgia, awaiting death, and how Truman and his aides were preventing any state from giving the president medical treatment in case he died and the Russians took over. But Martins was unsure exactly what he had been recruited for. He said he recalled a "meet and greet" with the head of the atomic bomb program, who told him the idea behind the new weapon was to "knock the hell out of the Berlin wall," by raining down bombs. And on multiple occasions, US Air Force officers called him "Martin McNelly" - and the name stuck. 'A big threat' But it is what happened next that many believe turned the head of the man
