I know that I could add some properties in application.yml file which are all contained in "org.springframework.boot" package but I don't know how to dynamically change them (i.e. switch to HTTP/s). Is there a way to achieve that? A: I was able to achieve it using this method: As I already mentioned, I'm using Spring Boot. There's an annotation @org.springframework.core.env.Environment - an interface so we can detect whether the current environment is "development" or "production". It also has the property, "isProd". To change the environment dynamically, i just added to the class where i'm using the Environment the following command: @Autowired private Environment env; Then, to change the environment, I just called: env.setProperty("spring.data.mongodb.uri", mongodb.url); If the "envinstion" is development, the properties are added, and if the "environment" is "production" the properties are changed. default layout is designed for keyboard and mouse, and we've included a good number of easy-to-use hotkeys on the keyboard that allow you to quickly switch between layers or manage your keys. With such a vast interface, a gamepad, if used, should be in your hot-zone, and we've included a secondary bindable button for easy switching. If you'd like to use your gamepad, we've included support for Xbox 360 controllers and controllers using a USB adapter. After completing a tutorial scenario, you will have access to the minigame menu and three web-based training modules. Customizable options will allow you to control the number of players in the scenario, the number of battlepacks (scenarios), and the number of days before the game starts. Both the tutorial and web-based training modules are an excellent tool to quickly get you up-to-speed.

POWER OF THE ALCHEMY - GREG KARANDELLIS * * * **'To begin with, we're a band of architects'**- Ronnie James Dio, Black Sabbath** ** 'To compare, the classical musician sits in the centre of the orchestral field like a hero. The symphony orchestra itself is a perfect analogy for every man - as a whole man, completely balanced and in perfect harmony, both within and without. The classical musician plays roles, which another, lesser musician can never hope to play. The classical musician is - basically - a normal man, a man in tune with himself and with the universe.'**- David Stuart, organist, Pears Instrument Company - quoted in** **The Guinness Book of Records, 1976** There are few things more satisfying than listening to a classical ensemble. The music itself carries a deeply emotional ability to engage and respond to, but there is a deeper connection with the audience, through the very act of listening. We - and our audience - can talk of composers, of great performances and even great orchestras, but for me the most magical moments come from when the people who love classical music and the musicians themselves come together in the space of the concert hall. It seems to me that we can learn from the great classical violinist Nigel Kennedy that the great art of the violin comes from its versatility. While we love the music of the violin, it is the stories and lives the violin can embody that can reach the deepest levels of sorrow and the height of passion. The orchestral musicians heard in this chapter are far more than 'musicians'. They are artists. With the true pieces of music in their own right, they can talk about the story as much, if not more, than the composition. The language of classical music allows us to make these connections. **Ronnie James Dio** During a concert at Carnegie Hall in December 1972, a young, ambitious classical musician began to write his own version of the rock song 'I Stand Alone'. The second section quoted in
