But that doesn't mean Yahoo is spending money as freely as it did during that time. This week, the company announced a 15 percent cut in its 2016 budget, saying it needed to save up for big projects in 2017. With the annual upgrade of its flagship app, a new video series and more, the changes will be especially painful. Yahoo CEO Marissa Mayer recently noted that the company's biggest challenge was "maintaining the pace of growth" when it comes to revenue. It's not a secret that Yahoo isn't on the same level as Google or Facebook when it comes to generating advertising revenue -- hence, the need to save money. But Yahoo needs to do more than just reduce costs. Earlier this year, Yahoo announced it would cut about 25 percent of its workforce. It's now doing the same with its own marketing team, a total of about 200 positions. The exact date for the layoffs won't be disclosed until next month, but Yahoo did say it would be finished by June of this year. The layoffs follow a major change of leadership at Yahoo. Mayer had promised a "top-to-bottom" reorganization of Yahoo in May 2012. The company had stagnated after a brief period of growth with the launch of the Yahoo Mail service in 2009. Since then, Yahoo has failed to turn a profit and has struggled with a weak market share, which has driven down its stock price. In January, the company officially decided to end its focus on developing its own web browser in favor of improving its core products, such as email. The company also announced plans to push its apps out to mobile devices. It's also becoming increasingly important to have other content available on smartphones. "We're really executing our plan to turn our apps into the center of our user
