Chrome Autofill Viewer is a simple, yet incredibly practical means of viewing autocomplete data, stored by Google Chrome on your various browsing sessions. The tool is designed to display the autocomplete fields from the 3-letter prefixes you typed, as stored by your browser, all in one list. It can also display the database files used by the utility, which can be in SQLite (similar to Microsoft Access database), HTML and CSV formats. Moreover, it can generate a report in HTML,

CSV, TXT or XML, for future reference. It can also be used to clean up the entire autocomplete database from your browser.Q: How to test one folder level deep using MSTest in VS2012? I have a web.config file at the root of my ASP.Net MVC 3 project which is here: C:\TEST\TEST1 I want to write tests to validate the contents of this file. If I write this test: [TestMethod()] public void TestWebConfigSettings() { string expected = "foo"; string actual; actual = ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["test-key"]; Assert.AreEqual(expected, actual); } It fails because the test actually looks at the contents of the folder TEST1, which does not contain the Web.config file. I can't test that file, because it doesn't reside at the root of the project. It resides one folder deep, but when the test uses ConfigurationManager.AppSettings, it searches the tests project (inside the test folder), not the root of the project. A: Config files can be included using DirectoryInfo's GetFileInfo method: var file = new

DirectoryInfo("C:\\TEST\\TEST1").GetFileInfo("Web.config");

ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["test-key"] = file.FullName; Posts Tagged "smoking cessation" LEWISBURG, Ind.
