Why we're moving onto a blockchain-based image sharing platform - tbarugli ===== tbarugli onto... This invention relates to food products and, more particularly, to a fat substitute and method of its preparation. A major problem encountered with some fat substitute products is the development of an undesirable thickening. This is especially the case when the substitute is used in a food process that requires the use of thickeners. While such products are sometimes used solely as low fat products (e.g. margarine), the use of such products in highly acceptable fat based foods, such as bakery goods (e.g. cookies) or dairy products (e.g. ice cream) places stringent requirements on the various properties of the fat substitute. Another problem encountered with many fat substitutes is the development of an undesirable color. For example, the color of commercially available margarine often varies considerably depending on the time at which the margarine is exposed to the light. One substitute which has some of the desirable properties of the fat, i.e., moisture content, and aroma is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,387,203. This product, however, is unsatisfactory due to its relatively high carbohydrate content and limited flavor stability. Thus, there is still a need for a substitute which is acceptable to consumers and which has a long shelf life. It is therefore an object of the invention to provide a low fat food product having acceptable organoleptic properties, a high moisture content and long shelf life. Another object of the invention is to provide a low fat food product which, when produced from the same ingredients used to produce conventional fat based food products, does not result in the undesirable thickening or color development.Q: regex for alternating digit sequences I'd like to find a regex to match digits with alternating number sequences, such as: 0..9 (

What's New In?

from the volvo-wip dept There is a serious problem with copyright law that primarily only affects people who want to distribute video with their own devices, not generally with a direct payment. One of the things that I found that shows this is that some studios, when they release movies, they make it available for free at first and then then try to make money from advertisements. So if a movie is released, it will be free at first and then be bought in the store with ads. The problem is if someone's own device is used to watch the video, then the per-view fee for those ads is paid for the device owner, not the publisher. Now, it's true that the content owner is not thrilled about this, but for a simple matter of scale, this can't go on forever. Won't someone just build the app, put it on their own website (or pull ads and micropayments from other websites) and make a profit without screwing over the content owners? Of course, the network effect would make that really difficult. Now, if someone set up a payment network to monetize video in a way that charged the content owners for that, that would be a new business model and could be a nice thing for all parties. The reality, though, is that this is part of an increasing problem in how media works. I can see that going the way of the cassette player, with ads and a pay-to-play system. from the letting-go-of-all-that-else dept Last week we wrote about how Netflix just announced a "seasonal" video service, which uses Chromecast. Well, it looks like that has nothing to do with a new service announced by the streaming service... it was actually just an updated version of the company's own app! And I'm still trying to understand what Netflix is trying to do here. Normally, any content a service provides -- whether you're looking at iTunes music, Spotify music, Netflix, Amazon, etc. -- are all parts of the same service. But Netflix is taking the approach of selling a product, and treating the device used to view it separately. The problem is, as you've seen, if you want to get the Netflix content on a device such as a Chromecast, you have to pay for it on that device, and you have to use that device to access it. And so the idea that this new app will be available
