beast. Popular this week With 199 followers and a months activity just over 1000 pageviews at this time, the stats don't really mean anything in the long run. I manage my own website based on GoDaddy space using WordPress. It is free to use, very customizable and opensource. A blog will probably drive around 5k-10k pageviews a month all by themselves. If you let this account create an ezine-style update less than once every two months, it's not likely to work, and is probably better to use a weblog. I've joined just about every online photo sharing service out there that exists. They all offer really nothing of value beyond sharing pictures with your friends though, so I never had much of a reason to keep using them. Google+ is the only one that seems to capture real value. It's the only one that people actually contribute any content back to. Yet almost no one except for me seems to care if they get somewhere else. My metric for contribution has been trackers. I keep track of where I was, and it's becoming clear that Google+ achieves the highest percentage of total contribution of any tracker out there. Google are very smart, and they know that tracking by network affiliation will become impossible if we all move to Googles's measurement engine. What I think will really rescue Google+ is Facebook. If you control the largest US network, you control the largest global network. If you can steal us and turn it into a Google-contrived platform, you can take all of the contact people create and alo their ability to form friendships. If Facebook needs to make something it's money for the rest of it's life, it might as well be the largest social web in the world. I've been logged on every day for about 9 months. I'm still connected once a month, but time after time it is like an affair with Russian billionaire - it starts fine but soon disintegrates into morass because you can never really get it out of first gear. Even with the improvements since then, Google+ still seems like a curiosity gadget that people join but that's it - there's no way to get them to stay. A lot of the major net providers have serious addons, and Gmail is becoming one. Looking at email from the
