This section introduces aspects that may help facilitate a better understanding of the inventions. Accordingly, these statements are to be read in this light and are not to be understood as admissions about what is or is not prior art. The ever increasing demand to produce inexpensive and efficient biodiesel feedstock has driven many efforts to find more sustainable and cost effective ways to convert vegetable oils or lipids into fermentable products like fatty acid alkyl esters (biodiesel) [1]. One of the most versatile approaches to convert vegetable oils into biodiesel is the biohydrogenation of lipids by microorganisms. This process, called transesterification, yields a compound called fatty acid methyl ester (FAME) [2]. While traditional transesterification reactions are conducted at temperatures around 30° C., the energy input required for conventional stirring and heating are high, which is in turn, adding to the operational cost. Also, the transesterification process is conducted using toxic solvents like methanol, for example. While the process is often successful, it is not very desirable. Therefore, the need for a solvent-free, high yield process for producing fatty acid methyl esters was recognized. Microorganisms offer an ideal solution to carrying out the process without a strong energy input. However, the microbial transesterification process has, till now, been limited to the production of FAME from solvent-containing mixtures using only naturally-occurring microbes. However, while these naturally-occurring processes are efficient, it would be much more preferable to obtain FAME with a higher yield and without the consumption of toxic solvents. Desirable properties of FAME include a very desirable fatty acid methyl ester with an abundance of trans-C18 fatty acids with a high cetane number, high carbon-chain distribution (so-called "rareness" index) and low acid number [3]. The concept of rareness index was introduced in the 1950s by Sumner et al. [4] for predicting the engine performance of diesel. Rareness index (RI) is a measure of the ratio of the mass of a molecule with higher number of carbon atoms (C) to that of a molecule with a lower number of carbon atoms (C) among the total mass of the molecules. In the case of FAME, RI is calculated by dividing the quantity of C18 molecules by the quantity of C12 and C16 molecules in a sample as shown in equation (1) [4].
