The IP standards describe a mechanism that reduces the power that a device is required to use to operate. For example, a network adapter operating in an IP infrastructure normally is required to stay "awake" to receive traffic from the network, or perform certain other functions. One of the IP standards that regulates the power consumption of a device is the Energy Saving Mode (ESM) specification. Power is reduced in an ESM mode in response to a trigger to thereby allow a device to use reduced power for performing its required functions. Depending upon the IP infrastructure configuration, it is possible for a device, e.g., a network adapter, to be placed in an ESM mode when little or no traffic is being processed by the device. For example, in a local area network (LAN) environment, the traffic processing components of the network adapter of a router typically remain active for most of the day. Accordingly, the network adapter consumes power constantly, even when most of the traffic being processed is local traffic, i.e., traffic being transmitted between the router and other routers in the same LAN. Thus, some network adapters in a network may be limited to an energy saving mode or another suitable power saving mode for an extended period of time. Some of the other types of power saving modes in the IP standards include: (1) stay awake mode, (2) power down mode, and (3) power save mode. For the other types of power saving modes, the IP standard defines what mode is available and how a device can trigger that mode. The IP standards have a goal of reducing the amount of energy consumed by devices, such as network adapters, in an IP infrastructure. However, the IP standards do not offer an easy way to measure the actual power consumed by a network adapter when not in an energy saving mode. Also, existing network adapters are not capable of determining if an energy saving mode is available. Complications of biliary surgery: the role of endoscopic treatment. Endoscopic treatment of complications after biliary surgery requires more experience and knowledge than endoscopic treatment of malignant biliary obstructions. Early endoscopic retrograde cholangiopancreatography (ERCP) or endoscopic papillotomy (EPT) is very often the most appropriate method of treatment. However, in case of duct stenoses no "easy" solution is available; more than twenty 5 to 20% stents, temporary or permanent diverting stents or the use of plastic stents are the only tools to resolve the obstruction. Patients with complete or partial biliary leaks after surgery tend to have good outcome with endoscopic treatment. Endoscopic sphincterotomy (EST) or papillary balloon-tamponade is the treatment of choice for acute pancreatitis. However, a high rate of relapses can be expected. There is only limited experience with endoscopic treatment of recurrent acute pancreatitis after cholecystectomy. Endoscopic therapy should not replace surgical therapy in these cases, unless patients are treated initially as cholecystectomized patients. Medical therapy for gallstones is the first choice in case of symptomatic gallstones. Balloon-tapered sphincterotomy is the treatment of choice to remove extrahepatic or common bile duct stones. Endoscopic biliary stenting is indicated in case of stent occlusion and often results in a temporary relief from cholangitis.
