I tried creating a class that has a fluid row and container with height:100% and then that class for each column. My idea was this way the div's will scale up with the text inside it. The problem is when I resize the window, the columns do not expand to be the full screen width. this is my code: TEST

Insydeflash Windows Bios Flash Utility Download.Q: How can I get an unknown number of arguments? I know that one of the functions in coreR is called with the argument unknown, which is a parameter that doesn't have a specific value, but I can't find any information about how to use it. Eg., when you call hist by default it uses hist(data) But I'd like to know what to do when there's only one argument in the data. If it is easy to do, I'd also like to know what to do when there is more than one argument, like if someone calls something like hist(data[1], data[2], data[3]) How can I get this information? A: We should use the... syntax, that allows us to pass extra arguments. For instance, if we want to pass a vector of data to the same function then we can do this (pardon the reshape(...) call on a small sample): myfun(data = read.table(text = "~/Dropbox/data/data.txt", header = TRUE)) A: As others have mentioned, the... style of parameter expansion is the easiest approach. However, if you really want to know what happens when you call hist(), then you can find out by disassembling the function: > dis(hist) > ## standard prologue etc. > hist(data) NULL So it's passing NULL as the first argument. You might want to use > (x typeof(x) [1] "list" > length(x) [1] 1 ... which tells you that you get the one data argument at the call site. (It's interesting to see how R is implemented: they take a set of generic functions that can be instantiated on any data type, and generate 6d1f23a050
