A.[Radioimmunological determination of serum thyroglobulin. An alternative to conventional methods of TSH-euthyroxin axis investigations? (author's transl)]. The serum thyroglobulin (STG) level was determined in 52 patients with clinical and morphological evidence of differentiated thyroid carcinoma and in 32 patients without evidence of thyroid disease. For diagnostic purposes, these patients were divided into various groups. Differentiation of the conditions under consideration was found to be possible on the basis of the STG values, particularly when they were compared with the serum TSH and the serum T4 levels. In the follow-up investigations, the results show that it is possible to distinguish between thyroid autonomy and hyperthyroidism on the basis of the change in the STG levels.1. people and $. This is the 27th in a series of “Quick Takes”, offering a brief synopsis of the week’s most notable news, along with my own two cents.

1. Immigration: The House passed a series of immigration measures that promised to clean up the mess left by the Senate last week. Those include increased security at our border, cleaning up the visa lottery program, providing visas for previously deported undocumented workers, and increasing penalties for employers who hire undocumented workers. Despite the amnesty provisions in the Senate version, there seems to be a real lack of interest among many House Democrats in addressing this issue in any substantive way. The amnesty part of the Senate bill's grant of immunity to employers who hire undocumented workers might be the only part that has gained support among House Democrats.

2. Cybersecurity: The federal government is just not prepared for what would happen if another attack on the U.S. financial system were to be launched. We don't really know what assets are protected, whether the best defenses are working, or if the government has the resources it needs to take on a full-time effort. It's becoming obvious that just spending money on adding to our cyberdefenses won't do
