Parecoxib, a cyclooxygenase-2 inhibitor, has been shown to reduce both acute and postoperative pain and opioid requirements in patients undergoing lower limb and abdominal surgery. The objectives of this study were to determine the effect of preoperative adjunctive parecoxib on pain following vaginal prolapse surgery and on the need for rescue opioids. This was a randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled trial of parecoxib 40 mg administered 30 minutes before incision or placebo. The primary efficacy variable was postoperative pain as measured using a 100-mm visual analog pain scale at 1 and 2 hours after surgery. Secondary efficacy variables included postoperative opioid requirements, amount of postoperative rescue analgesic consumption, and patient satisfaction. Ninety-eight women, 40 to 81 years of age, who had experienced prolapse for at least 6 months with stage III or IV cervical or uterine prolapse or both were randomized to receive placebo or parecoxib. Women who had received analgesia (n=5) or were allergy to NSAID (n=1) were excluded. The number of women who completed the study was
