Piezo-controlled exercise and anaesthesia in rats. The present paper describes a method which allows the introduction of anaesthesia, and the subsequent recording of physiological parameters, into free-moving animals. A piezo-actuated syringe (100 μ l) was used to infuse lidocaine, ketamine, chloral hydrate, pentobarbital, or urethane. The anaesthesia is considered to be sustained when the rat exhibits no rhythmic respiration, muscular contractions, or reflex movements during 5 min. In this study, the injection of urethane was found to result in a stable anaesthesia lasting for at least 6 h. The rat had to run on a treadmill in order to receive access to water. The recovery phase lasted 1 h. The stress related to the injections was considered to be minimal. Rats kept in cages for at least 5 h following the injection of urethane exhibited no signs of stress. After completing the experiments, the animals were returned to their home cages. In summary, this procedure allows the use of a free-moving animal for electrophysiological recordings, or for the delivery of drugs or other substances.
