A strategy for the preservation of the operating room for reconstructive surgery. Over the last several years, reconstructive surgery using a combination of microsurgical and endoscopic techniques has become the method of choice for facial reconstruction. However, many patients requiring facial reconstruction are not candidates for these new procedures. If the operating room is to be used, the result will be failure. A philosophy was developed to optimize the result of reconstructive surgery. This strategy required that several steps be taken prior to the need for the operating room. The patient must be diagnosed correctly, qualified for the procedures to be performed, and the indications for surgery be established. If the patient is not eligible for the different procedures, then either one of two situations may be found: 1) the defects that require surgery exist with an adequate supply of tissue that can be resected by the techniques used, or 2) the patient is not a good candidate for the procedure(s) being performed. In the latter instance, the patient should be informed of the potential for failure of the reconstructive efforts and clear guidelines should be established as to what results should be expected. Some retail display fixtures include a face region having an opening. Typically the opening of the face region is covered by a display panel that rotates and opens about the opening
