Only a quarter of the employees brushed their teeth more than once a day. One in four reported never brushing their teeth or had never been told to brush them regularly. There are no reliable measurements of toothbrushing frequency among the general population, but the few population-based studies available are striking. A U.S. study involving 39-year-old women found that 90% of those who did not brush their teeth reported never doing so. Even among dentate women, more than 60% said they never brushed their teeth.⁸ A 14-year U.S. survey found that among those who dined at the U.S. lunch counters, about 70% reported never brushing their teeth.⁹ The prevalence of dental disease is highest among those with no access to preventative dental services. Such individuals are at the lowest end of the socioeconomic ladder and have the least access to information about oral hygiene. As a result, they have the highest tooth decay, gum disease, and lost teeth. These findings are consistent with those of a 1988 survey of Mexican adults.¹⁰ Persons with the lowest incomes, lowest educational levels, and fewest years of education in Mexico had significantly greater proportions of decayed, missing, and filled teeth than did those with higher incomes, higher educational levels, and more years of education in Mexico. A 1988 National Health Interview Survey found that the prevalence of periodontal disease increased with age in U.S. whites but not in blacks.¹¹ A study of dental surveys in New Orleans, Louisiana, found that tooth decay and periodontal disease prevalence were correlated with household income and socioeconomic status.¹² Unfortunately, the most effective step toward improving dental health—increasing the frequency with which people brush their teeth—is performed least frequently. Because the cost of replacing missing teeth is significant, the immediate human and economic costs of untreated dental disease should be considered in any estimate of the costs of oral care. These costs include more expensive and less-productive work d0c515b9f4
