The center of the artificial world was a huge, round, cuboid room. Some were rectangular, others almost spherical, others small, some large. The room's floor was smooth and could be entered through one of several staircases or bridges, but there was no way to enter the room's walls. In what ways are we most similar to other people? Q: Extend the class loader, not the class I am trying to figure out a way to extend the class loader of a running java process. For example, if I do `new java.security.SecureRandom();` and it will output random bytes. This seems to be a security issue, in that if I know the class loader, I can modify the implementation and not require the invoking code to be signed. I know about potential issues with the java security model being circumvented. However, this method just seems wrong to me. I think the java security model has been circumvented on purpose, in order to prevent bad code from running in the JVM. If I have a bytecode modification library which can override the secure random class loader in the JVM, what prevents me from modifying the java bytecode that happens to be compiled into a class that is loaded by the JVM, using some

I have seen some sites around the internet where they will ask for paypal donations. I am curious if such a thing is ok/inconvenient for a person to be unable to donate for some reason? A: No, it's not OK. It's uncouth and also a violation of PayPal's terms, which are quite clear about what you're not allowed to do to people. If you're going to ask users for donations, you should do what those sites do: Give a huge amount of information so users know the true value of what you're asking for (donating 1, 5, 10, 20, 50 cents, etc.) Give a big button at the bottom of the page that says "Help me maintain this site!" or "I can't afford it, help me out". If you think it's hard to figure out what value a single donation can bring, imagine what it's like when you have to take in 600 donations a month, or 300, or 80, or 20, or 10. Or when you actually have a day job. 2013–14 Malaysian FA Cup The 2013–14 Malaysian FA Cup, also called the Liga FA Cup (Malay: Piala FA) is the 98th edition of the Malaysian FA Cup, a football competition for Malaysia's state football teams.
