Q: What happens if I don't hear a question? As a new user, I didn't know that the new posts would pop up one by one. I finished answering the first question (which was really confusing), and I didn't have time to read the second question before it disappeared. I clicked quickly on the next question to quickly get my answer but this is the result I had: Now what I would like to know is what would have happened if I just waited the first question to pop up again. I'm asking because I still want to have a Stack Overflow account (I'm a newbie) and I'm not comfortable with people knowing how little time I read questions (for some reason I assumed that there were questions that were open already). A: Ok, I think I understand what happened. When you posted your answer, you had enough reputation to post one question per minute. You said you didn't have time to read the second question and just clicked on the next question. By the time you got to the third question, you had no more questions to answer, and the system made the question disappear. By clicking next, you got to the fourth question, in which the system showed you another question for you to answer. You did not have any more questions, so the system asked you to answer it anyway. You did, but that's all that happened - it didn't update the fourth question. So, you answered the fourth question, the system copied your answer, and nothing else happened. This is really just the standard way of things, as your rep grows you get more right away, for now if you have a crappy question you just have to deal with it being deleted. The system will probably fix this by giving you a notification if you are, for example, writing more than one answer per question. Migraine and depressive disorders. This article reviews the recent literature about migraine and depressive disorders. The triad of migraine, depressive disorders, and emotional factors probably underlies the association between the two, with a prevalence of comorbidity on the order of 75%. Pharmacological evidence for interrelationships between migraine and depression, as well as evidence from clinical trials, is presented. Despite the overlap between the disorders, there are distinctions which may be important in the therapeutic management of either migraine or depression. The simultaneous use of medication for both disorders requires further study. Recommendations about specific pharmacological agents are presented along with therapeutic

Q: Can I modify a Salesforce.com Worklight adapter with a workspace? I have a project that developed with Worklight Studio 6.0 and we installed it into our QA environment. I made some changes in adapter code that I need to deploy into our production instance and in order to do it I need to modify the adapter code and deployment configuration (adding some parameters and changing the value of some variables), but I need to be able to do it without touching the source code of my changes. So I found out that I could edit the source code of my project and modify the adapter code in situ. But the problem is that I have a workspace, so the modified code is not recognized by Worklight Studio. And I can't modify source code in place, because the workspace is protected. The question is, can I modify a Salesforce.com adapter code that I develop with Worklight Studio using a workspace? A: You can indeed modify the source code of an adapter in a workspace - just make sure you understand the implications. If you do this, the version which you have made changes to (the one from the workspace) will be deployed to the server, but there will also be a corresponding cloned copy in the workspace that you can continue to modify. Obviously, the changes to the code are not automatically (re-)processed when you deploy the version back from the workspace to the server, but as you have already done that in your question, that should not be a problem. If you later clone the server, you will also end up with a cloned copy of the workspace's (app) source code that you can modify (as you are already doing).
