The pharmacology, toxicology and therapeutic use of gallium nitrate are reviewed. The only available controlled studies of chronic gallium nitrate treatment in man were performed during the 1960s and 1970s at the University of Alabama in Birmingham. This treatment produced significant clinical and laboratory effects that are described in detail. The biologic activities of gallium nitrate and its effects on the body are similar to those of tin, albeit with weaker effects. But the effects produced by gallium nitrate in man are more specific. It is well tolerated by the majority of patients. There is no evidence to indicate that it causes any harm to the unborn child. Gallium nitrate has been used with some success to treat the cancer of the prostate, but the therapeutic effect is only temporary. It is used as a palliative for patients with inoperable carcinoma of the pancreas, where other forms of treatment are ineffective. Gallium nitrate, which is transported into the body via the mucosa of the gastrointestinal tract, is currently used in the palliative treatment of the oesophageal carcinoma and in the treatment of the arthritis of patients with cancer of the prostate. Although a number of clinical trials are underway, there is no published evidence of any gallium nitrate effect in any form of cancer apart from the prostate cancer.
